

Campaign Guide

Glint

FREEDOM TAKES FORM.

Advertising Campaign

All campaign imagery, featured talent, social media profiles, and brand partnerships presented in this guide are conceptual mock-ups for creative exploration and discussion only. They do not represent final advertising executions, confirmed collaborations, or endorsements.

DESIRE BEFORE EXPLANATION
BUILD WANT BEFORE WE EXPLAIN HOW IT WORKS

GLINT is a connected drinking vessel, but its advertising should not begin by explaining connectivity. The product contains technology - reminders, light, optional sound, app and wearable integration, temperature performance, and an interchangeable cup system - but those capabilities are not the first reason someone should want it.
Advertising has a different job. It should create desire for the object and curiosity about the world around it. GLINT should feel considered, personal, expressive, and naturally present across different kinds of lives before the audience understands every feature. Technology supports that experience; it does not need to dominate it.
GLINT should be desirable before it is explainable.

SHOW WHAT BEGINS WITH GLINT
MOVE FROM PRODUCT USE TO HUMAN CONSEQUENCE

Traditional product advertising often stops at use: a light turns on, a lid opens, a drink is poured, a person takes a sip. Those actions are true to GLINT, but they are only the beginning. The more useful creative question is what happens next.
A reminder may become a pause. A pause may become a moment to notice where you are. A cup of tea may create a few minutes alone. A selected sound may shift the atmosphere around you. Two people carrying GLINT may notice one another and begin a conversation. A familiar object may travel into an unfamiliar place and become part of a memory. The product creates the opening; the person determines what follows. That is where GLINT advertising should live: not only in the mechanism, but in the moments, choices, relationships, and inner shifts that can begin around it. We do not only show the object. We show the moment that begins with it.

FROM FUNCTION TO CONSEQUENCE A THREE-LEVEL CREATIVE FRAMEWORK

PRODUCT is what GLINT physically does: remind, illuminate, connect, carry, pour, change, and personalize. EXPERIENCE is what those functions enable: pause, movement, awareness, sharing, expression, and choice. CONSEQUENCE is what can grow from the experience: conversation, imagination, connection, discovery, memory, a relationship, or simply a different moment within an ordinary day.

Not every advertisement needs to communicate all three levels. One execution may show the product clearly; another may focus almost entirely on a person; another may become surreal and imaginative; another may show two strangers meeting. Across the campaign, these different executions build a fuller understanding of what GLINT can become in someone's life.

THE PRODUCT IS NOT THE END OF THE STORY USE TECHNOLOGY WHEN IT HELPS TELL THE STORY

GLINT can move beyond the visual language of conventional smart products because the campaign does not need to repeatedly prove that the bottle contains technology. Instead, technology should appear when it helps initiate the narrative. A glow may begin the scene. Removing the cup may trigger sound. A wearable may quietly acknowledge a reminder. Then the advertisement moves beyond the mechanism.
The interesting part is what the person chooses to do with the moment that has been created. This keeps the campaign grounded in real product behavior while giving imagination room to enter. GLINT remains credible without being reduced to a feature demonstration.

ONE BRAND. MANY LIVES. TWO VISUAL TERRITORIES, ONE PHILOSOPHY

GLINT is not designed around a single image of wellness. No age, profession, aesthetic, routine, body type, activity, or personality defines the GLINT person. Someone may carry it to work, to class, to a gallery, to training, to dinner, onto a train, across the world, into the garden, or nowhere farther than the chair by the window.
That breadth should be visible in the advertising. The campaign therefore uses two complementary visual territories: portraiture, where the person becomes the world, and fashion/lifestyle, where the world around the person becomes the story.

THE PERSON BECOMES THE WORLD

Portraiture allows GLINT to appear beside people with distinctly different ages, styles, identities, attitudes, and ways of carrying themselves.
The product remains recognizable while everything around it changes.
The intention is not representation as a checklist; it is to communicate that there is no single GLINT identity.

Portrait: AS YOU ARE

The portraits should feel confident rather than instructional. They are not demonstrations of hydration; they are statements of character. Quiet confidence can be as powerful as bold expression, and elegance can sit beside eccentricity. Age, style, and personality do not determine who belongs in the GLINT world. The person does not become a model for GLINT; GLINT enters their world.
GLINT does not ask the person to fit the brand. The brand makes room for the person. Individual portraits carry short, image-specific statements such as STILL BECOMING., STILL MY WAY., MAKE IT YOURS., OWN YOUR FORM., AS YOU ARE., and YOUR FORM. YOUR WAY.

Each statement responds to the individuality of the person portrayed while reinforcing the same underlying belief: freedom to define oneself rather than conform to a predetermined identity.

MAKE IT YOURS.
FREEDOM TAKES FORM. Glint

OWN YOUR FORM.
FREEDOM TAKES FORM. Glint

AS YOU ARE.
FREEDOM TAKES FORM. Glint

YOUR FORM. YOUR WAY.
FREEDOM TAKES FORM. Glint

IN STYLE.
IN LIFE.

FASHION AND LIFESTYLE

THE WORLD BECOMES THE STORY

If portraiture shows the range of people who can inhabit GLINT, fashion and lifestyle advertising shows the range of worlds GLINT can inhabit. Here the campaign can become cinematic, editorial, playful, romantic, unexpected, or surreal. GLINT may appear within clothing, architecture, travel, nature, nightlife, movement, fantasy, or an ordinary situation viewed differently.
People do not experience the things they carry as isolated products. Objects become part of how they dress, move, travel, socialize, work, rest, and imagine themselves. GLINT should therefore participate in culture rather than exist only within the visual conventions of drinkware. The product can remain clearly visible without always being the largest object in the frame: sometimes held, sometimes nearby, sometimes integrated into the composition, sometimes the small detail that changes the meaning of the scene.
The purpose is not to turn GLINT into a conventional fashion accessory. It is to establish that a functional object can also carry aesthetic and emotional desire.

OWN YOUR PRESENCE.
FREEDOM TAKES FORM. Glint

MOVE YOUR WAY.
FREEDOM TAKES FORM. Glint

SET YOUR OWN TONE.

FREEDOM TAKES FORM. Glint

MOVE YOUR WAY.

Glint

FREEDOM TAKES FORM.

IN LIFE IN DREAM

REALITY CAN OPEN INTO IMAGINATION

USE FANTASY WHEN IT BEGINS IN PRODUCT TRUTH

Surreal imagery gives GLINT a larger emotional territory without requiring the campaign to abandon reality. A real product interaction can become the doorway into an inner experience: someone is alone between meetings; the GLINT signal appears; they remove the cup; a selected sound begins - ocean, rain, wind, or soft resonance. They pour tea, close their eyes, and the office gives way to a remembered or imagined place. Then they return. Nothing supernatural needs to be claimed. The advertisement is visualizing the emotional shift created by a small sensory moment. Fantasy remains credible because the imaginary world begins with something GLINT actually does.

LET THE PRODUCT BEGIN A CONVERSATION

The same principle can be applied to human connection. Two strangers notice each other’s GLINT across a shared table, train, class, airport lounge, or event. One asks about the cup color; the other responds. The bottle becomes the beginning of a conversation. The advertisement does not need to claim that GLINT creates friendship. It shows that a distinctive personal object can create an opening through which something human may occur. One execution might end with two strangers talking. Another might show them meeting again. Another could show two GLINT bottles sitting beside one another years later. The product remains the thread; the relationship becomes the story. GLINT does not manufacture connection. It creates opportunities for connection to begin.

A LARGER CREATIVE TERRITORY
GLINT AS A DOORWAY

Taken together, these approaches give the campaign room to move into imagination, movement, conversation, memory, discovery, expression, travel, companionship, or simply a few minutes that feel different from everything around them. This does not make GLINT magical; it makes the advertising interested in human consequence rather than mechanical demonstration. The bottle begins the action. The person completes the meaning.

THE MASTER CAMPAIGN IDEA

FREEDOM TAKES FORM is the consistent advertising signature because freedom inside the GLINT system is expressed through choice rather than as an abstract promise. It appears in what someone drinks, how the bottle looks, which cup they use, whether they connect, whether they choose light or sound, when they schedule a reminder, whether they respond, where they go, who they speak to, and what the moment becomes. The form can continue to change because the person remains in control. The line therefore belongs equally to the product, the person, and the campaign world.

ONE CAMPAIGN LINE. MANY HUMAN THOUGHTS
CONSISTENCY WITHOUT REPETITION

FREEDOM TAKES FORM should remain the consistent campaign signature, while the primary headline changes according to the specific person, scene, or story. The variable line gives each execution emotional specificity; the master line keeps every impression connected to the same larger brand idea.

Social Media Campaign

MAKE ROOM FOR WONDER./Freedom Takes Form.
TAKE THE LONG WAY./Freedom Takes Form.
STILL MY WAY./Freedom Takes Form.
SAY HELLO FIRST./Freedom Takes Form.
GO OFF SCRIPT./Freedom Takes Form.
CLOSE YOUR EYES. GO SOMEWHERE./Freedom Takes Form.
KEEP BECOMING./Freedom Takes Form.
BUILD MEMORY FOR GLINT.
LEARN THE PRINCIPLE. OWN THE EXPRESSION.

The campaign can learn from strong brands without inheriting their visual identity. Innovation does not require speaking like a technology company. References can be inspiration or a steppingstone, but the final expression must build recognition for GLINT itself.

Over time, that recognition should come from GLINT's own visual and verbal cues: the product silhouette, cup form, GLINT mark, palette, unexpected orange, contrast between calm and disruption, editorial portraiture, imaginative worlds, and language centered on agency. Every dollar spent communicating GLINT should strengthen memory for GLINT, not another brand.

THE ROLE OF ADVERTISING

CREATE DESIRE. ESTABLISH MEANING.
BUILD RECOGNITION.
Social media asks people to participate through WHAT IS YOUR GLINT? Advertising has a different role: it shows why GLINT is worth becoming curious about in the first place. Advertising creates the world; social gives people permission to enter it; the product makes the promise tangible; and partnerships can eventually expand that world into new places and experiences. Advertising therefore does not need to carry every piece of product information. Its role is more focused: create desire, establish meaning, build recognition, and open possibility.

THE CAMPAIGN PRINCIPLE
SHOW WHAT BEGINS WITH GLINT

Do not show only what the bottle does, what it looks like, or who carries it. Show the pause, the thought, the conversation, the place, the imagination, the relationship, the decision, and the change that can begin around it.

GLINT creates the opening. The person decides what begins.

WHAT IS YOUR "GLINT"?

START WITH A QUESTION

GLINT's first social campaign begins with a simple exchange.
The brand starts by sharing a series of images under the statement:
My GLINT is _____.
Each post gives the phrase a different meaning.
My GLINT is freedom. My GLINT is our rhythm. My GLINT is a pause.
My GLINT is out and about. My GLINT is imagination.

Some stories are expansive and symbolic. Others are ordinary and deeply personal. Together, they establish one idea: GLINT does not have to mean the same thing to everyone. Every post then turns the statement outward with a question: What is your GLINT?

That question is the invitation. Rather than asking people simply to photograph a product, GLINT gives them something to respond to. They can show where they carry it, what they drink from it, who they spend time with, how they personalize it, or what a particular moment means to them.

The first images provide inspiration without becoming instructions.
Someone may see "My GLINT is a pause" and interpret the idea in their own way.
Another may borrow the format but change the meaning completely.
One response creates the possibility of another.
This is how the campaign is designed to grow.

The brand begins the conversation, but it does not need to remain the only voice in it.

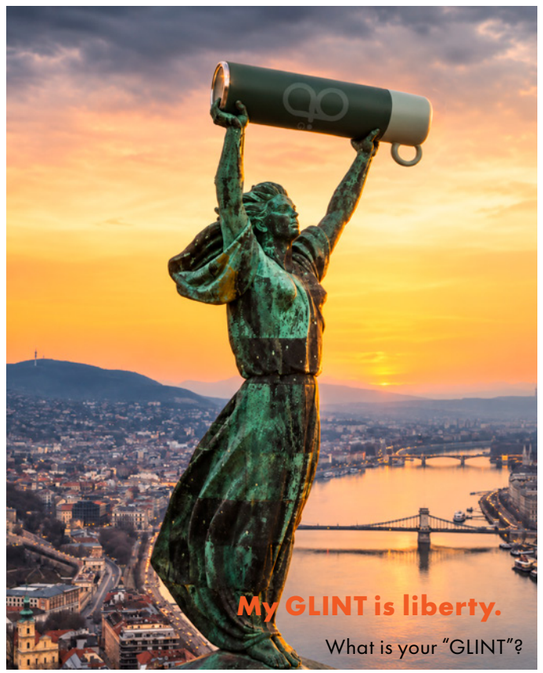

As people begin sharing their own "My GLINT is..." stories, each post becomes both a personal expression and a new introduction to GLINT. Friends encounter the idea through people they already know. Some may imitate what they see; others may want to answer the question differently.
The recognizable phrase remains constant while the imagery, meaning, people, places, and experiences continue to change. That repetition gives the campaign recognition. The differences give it life.

Selected community stories can then be shared through GLINT's own channels, placing brand-created imagery and real experiences beside one another.
Over time, the campaign becomes less about GLINT telling people what the brand represents and more about showing the many meanings people have attached to it.
Participation becomes part of the advertising.
Not because everyone is asked to repeat the same message, but because everyone is given room to make the message their own.

GLINT provides the beginning.
People carry the story forward.

What is your "GLINT"?

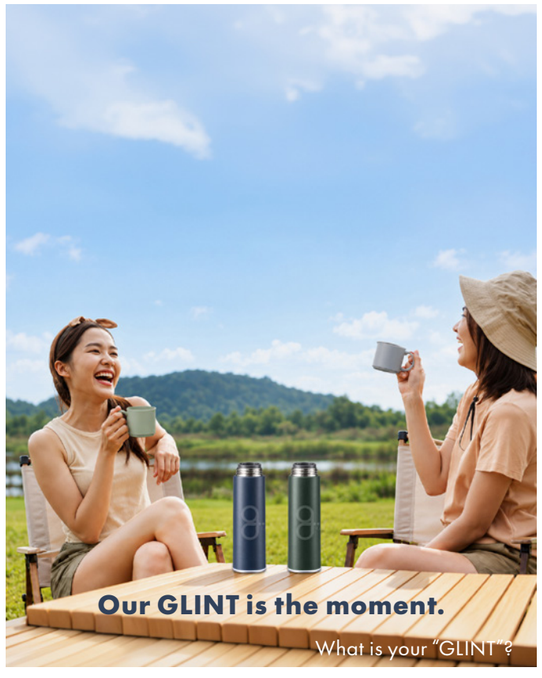

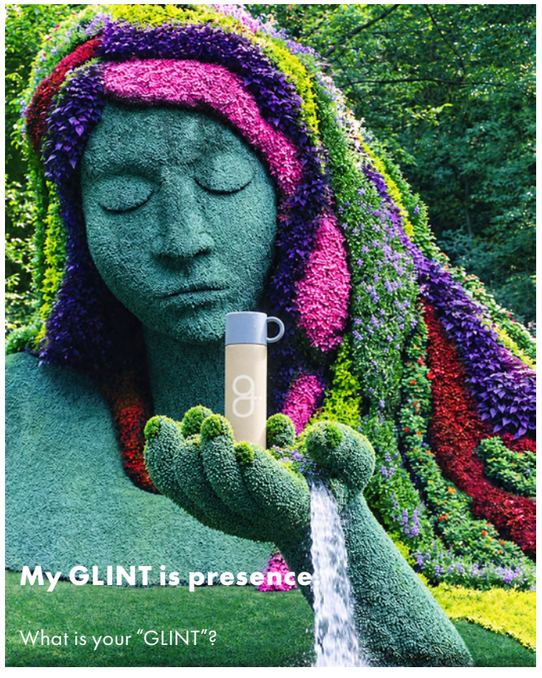

What is your "GLINT"?

PARTNERSHIP CAMPAIGN STRATEGY

FROM PERSONAL MEANING TO SHARED EXPERIENCE

GLINT's first social campaign establishes a recognizable language of participation. Through "What is your GLINT?", the brand introduces a simple format that people can understand, repeat, and reinterpret: MY GLINT IS _____. As that language becomes familiar, partnerships can extend the conversation into new places, communities, and experiences.

GLINT begins by supplying the first answers. The campaign then invites people to provide their own — through the places they go, the people they spend time with, the drinks they carry, and the moments they choose to notice. This first stage is important because it gives GLINT something more valuable than visibility alone: a recognizable way for people to participate in the brand. Once that behavior begins to exist, partnerships can expand it.
The role of a partnership is therefore not simply to place GLINT beside another recognizable name. A strong partner should give the existing GLINT idea a context it could not create as effectively on its own. The question becomes:

What can this partner add to the GLINT experience?
A travel partner can add place and discovery.
A hospitality partner can add temporary belonging.
A movement partner can add activity and performance.
A cultural partner can add local perspective.
A food or beverage partner can add taste and gathering.
GLINT, in return, brings a personal object that can move through all of those experiences while retaining the same underlying philosophy of choice. The partner changes the context. GLINT provides the continuity.

THE PARTNERSHIP PRINCIPLE

The strongest collaborations should create something that feels natural to both brands rather than forcing one brand into the other's world.
For GLINT, that means looking for partners around which people already experience one or more of the following: movement, place, connection, discovery, personal choice, shared experience, or change. The collaboration should also give the audience something to do.
Rather than ending with a co-branded advertisement, the campaign should open a new question, behavior, experience, or form of participation.
That allows the partnership to move through several channels:
Advertising creates awareness.
Social media invites response.
The partner provides the context.
The product creates a physical connection.

The community extends the story.
The result is not one advertisement repeated across different media. It is one idea expressed differently according to where people encounter it.

A POTENTIAL EXAMPLE: GLINT × AIRBNB

Airbnb provides a useful example of how this approach could work.

The strategic connection is not simply that people bring bottles when they travel. The deeper connection is that both brands can participate in the experience of moving from the familiar into the unfamiliar while allowing the individual to decide what that experience becomes.
A traveler leaves home. The surroundings change. The routine changes. The people around them change. Yet certain personal objects travel with them and create continuity within that change.

GLINT can be one of those objects. That companionship can be both emotional and practical. GLINT travels as a familiar personal object, while its optional connected experience can help the person prepare for unfamiliar drinking-water conditions and respond when arrangements change. The collaboration can therefore explore not only where GLINT goes, but how it becomes useful along the way. That gives the collaboration a natural campaign question: WHERE IS YOUR GLINT TODAY? The phrase extends the language already established through "What is your GLINT?" The first campaign asks people to define GLINT personally.

The partnership campaign asks them to show where that personal object has gone. The structure is familiar enough to feel connected to the original campaign while opening an entirely new territory for storytelling.

THE CAMPAIGN IDEA
WHERE IS YOUR GLINT TODAY?

The campaign begins through advertising created by GLINT and the travel partner.
Instead of treating the destination as a backdrop for product photography, the imagery shows GLINT moving through the experience of being somewhere else. A bottle sits beside morning coffee in a temporary apartment. It disappears into a bag before a walk through an unfamiliar neighborhood. It comes out during a train journey. It sits on a table during a meal. It travels to the beach, a market, a museum, a trail, a family home, or somewhere the traveler had not planned to visit. The destination can be extraordinary. It can also be completely ordinary.

That distinction is important because the campaign should not suggest that meaningful travel belongs only to people taking expensive international trips. Where is your GLINT today? can be answered from another continent or from the other side of town.

The advertising introduces the possibility. Social media then hands the question to the audience. People can begin posting their own answers:
Lisbon. The train to Boston. My grandmother's house. A cabin for the weekend. The café we found by accident. Back home.
The campaign grows because every answer becomes another interpretation of the same question.

FROM DESTINATION TO CONNECTION

Travel also gives the campaign another dimension. People rarely remember a journey only through the places they visited. They remember the people they encountered there. A host who made an unfamiliar neighborhood feel easier to understand. Someone met over breakfast. A local recommendation that became an afternoon together. Another traveler whose plans briefly crossed their own. A stranger who became someone they continued talking to after returning home.
This allows the partnership to move naturally from place into human connection.

WHERE IS YOUR GLINT TODAY? can eventually lead to:
WHO DID YOUR GLINT MEET?

The campaign is no longer simply documenting where the product traveled. It begins documenting what happened because the person went there.
That creates a second group of social stories:
MY GLINT IS SAYING HELLO FIRST.
MY GLINT IS PULLING UP A CHAIR.
MY GLINT IS SOMEONE WHO KNEW THE WAY.
OUR GLINT STARTED HERE.

The product remains present, but it is no longer required to dominate the image. Two bottles sitting on a breakfast table may tell the story more effectively than someone holding the product toward the camera. GLINT becomes evidence that the moment happened rather than the subject of every moment.
THE PRODUCT CAN PARTICIPATE.

A partnership can also extend beyond communication into the physical GLINT system. Because the cup is interchangeable, a collaboration does not require the creation of an entirely new bottle. A partner, destination, local artist, designer, or maker could create a limited cup expression connected to a particular place or experience.

This provides a much more natural relationship between partnership and product. The person continues using the GLINT they already own. Only one element changes. That change can carry a memory of where the object has been.

A possible GLINT × Airbnb program, for example, might invite selected local creators to interpret their city, landscape, or community through a cup designed specifically for that collaboration.
The intention would not be to create a collectible system built around completing a set.
The principle remains the same as GLINT's existing accessory program: choice rather than obligation. A traveler might visit several places and choose nothing. Another might select one particular cup because that place meant something to them.
The commercial opportunity exists, but the emotional value comes first.

THE BOTTLE TRAVELS.
THE CUP REMEMBERS.

FROM CAMPAIGN TO EXPERIENCE

A deeper partnership could also connect GLINT with experiences offered through the partner.
For a travel collaboration, these might include activities in which the GLINT philosophy feels natural: walking through a city with a local guide, sharing tea, exploring a food market, hiking, cycling, practicing movement outdoors, drawing in a new environment, or simply discovering a neighborhood through someone who knows it well.
The partnership can also create value through small, practical services. GLINT REFILL, available independently of any individual partner, could help people locate reported drinking-water refill points and consult guidance relevant to the place they are visiting. Within a potential GLINT × Airbnb collaboration, hosts might contribute useful information about their accommodation's drinking-water arrangements, nearby refill opportunities, or alternative sources when appropriate. That local knowledge would complement authoritative drinking-water guidance rather than replace it.
Consider a traveler who begins the day with coffee in GLINT, then wants plain water while exploring an unfamiliar neighborhood. The connected service could help them find their next fill. In this way, the collaboration offers something beyond advertising or a welcome gift: it can make an ordinary part of the travel experience easier. The service is used only when the person wants it, while the bottle continues to accompany them throughout the journey.
GLINT does not need to become the reason for the activity. It accompanies the person through it.
That distinction keeps the partnership from becoming overly promotional. The partner provides access to the experience. GLINT becomes part of how the person carries themselves through it. The social story then emerges naturally from what happened.

KNOW BEFORE YOU GO. ADAPT AS YOU GO.

The journey begins with preparation. The experience continues through everything that cannot be planned.

Travel begins long before arrival. Someone choosing a destination or preparing for a stay may want to understand the local drinking-water conditions, identify suitable refill opportunities, and make alternative arrangements where necessary. These practical considerations can influence how confidently a person approaches an unfamiliar place.

GLINT REFILL could support that preparation through optional destination guidance, refill discovery, and information relevant to the traveler's plans. A potential GLINT × Airbnb collaboration could extend the experience by allowing participating hosts to share useful knowledge about their accommodation's drinking-water arrangements and local refill opportunities, complementing rather than replacing authoritative water-safety guidance.

But preparation is only the beginning. A planned stop may be unavailable. A journey may take an unexpected direction. A local recommendation may lead to a different neighborhood, a shared experience, or an encounter that was never part of the itinerary.

At those moments, GLINT could become useful again. The traveler might consult the app, ask about alternatives, or explore another refill option in the area. The technology supports the practical decision without determining where the experience must lead.

This is where the partnership becomes more than an advertising association. The host contributes local perspective. GLINT offers a familiar companion and access to relevant information. The traveler brings their own decisions, curiosity, and willingness to explore.

The value is not in eliminating every uncertainty. It is in helping someone feel prepared enough to respond when circumstances change—and free enough to welcome what was never planned.

The information supports the choice. The journey remains their own.

THE PARTICIPATION LOOP

The campaign can grow through a repeating cycle:
GLINT introduces the question. The partner introduces a new context. Advertising shows what that context could look like. People experience it for themselves. Social media gives them a way to respond. Selected responses return to GLINT and partner channels. Those stories inspire the next person to participate. Each new story becomes both content and invitation. Some people may imitate an idea they have already seen. Others may deliberately do something different. Both behaviors help the campaign grow because the format remains recognizable while the expression continues to change. The brand controls the framework. The audience supplies the variation.

WHAT BOTH BRANDS GAIN

The collaboration should create value on both sides.
For GLINT, the partner provides access to environments, experiences, communities, and cultural contexts that help the brand become part of real life rather than remaining solely a product story.

For the partner, GLINT provides a physical companion that can continue the experience beyond the booking, event, trip, or activity itself.

For a hospitality collaboration, the relationship could also extend into practical assistance. A service such as GLINT REFILL may help guests prepare before departure and adjust their arrangements during a stay, while local partners contribute information specific to the places they know.

The partnership therefore has the potential to live before, during, and after the experience.

Before: anticipation and preparation.
During: participation and practical assistance.
After: memory and continued use.
That longevity is especially valuable because the relationship does not necessarily end when the campaign impression or trip ends. The GLINT goes home. The photograph remains. The cup may remain. The friendship may remain.

TRAVEL PLANS BEFORE GLINT

TRAVEL PLANS AFTER GLINT

Glint
FREEDOM TAKES FORM.

The story continues.

A PLATFORM, NOT A SINGLE PARTNERSHIP

Airbnb is one example of how the system could work. The larger opportunity is to create a partnership platform flexible enough to move across different categories without losing its identity.
Depending on the partnership, the conversation can expand through questions such as:
What is your GLINT?
Where is your GLINT today?
Who did your GLINT meet?
What did your GLINT bring home?

What remains consistent is the structure: GLINT creates an opening. The partner expands the world around it. The person decides what the experience means. That is the strategic strength of the partnership program. GLINT does not need to reinvent itself every time another brand enters the conversation.
The world around GLINT can change while the philosophy remains intact.

GO OFF SCRIPT.
Glint
FREEDOM TAKES FORM.